«How can human behaviour be described? Surely only by sketching the actions of a variety of humans, as there are all mixed up together.

What determines our judgment, our concepts and reactions, is not what one man is doing now, an individual action, but the whole hurly-burly of human actions, the background against which we see any action.»

(Wittgenstein, L., Zettel §567, Basil Blackwell, Oxford, 1967)
